DEFINING YOUR NEEDS

Your lender has finally pre-approved you for a mortgage and so now you are anxious to find your dream home, but what type of home are you looking for?

Is it a single family home, a duplex, a townhome, or perhaps a two bedroom condominium?

Do you want new, or pre-owned owned home?

Do you want to be in town, or in the suburbs?

What is your tolerance for noise?

Do you need to be close to public transportation, a hospital, or perhaps schools?

Would you be willing to give up a laundry room for a workshop?

What about location? It has often been said the three most important factors in choosing a property are, location, location, location, do you agree?

These and many other questions, including the ones you have not yet thought of, should all be carefully taken into consideration when you are looking for a home.

Today the interior layout and the use of the indoor space, as well as outdoor considerations play an much more important role in a families decision on what to buy.

For example are all of the bedrooms on one level?

Is there a separate family room for the children to use when they have friends over?

Is there a dining room, and does the master bedroom have an ensuite with jetted bath?

Comfort it seems matters, space and layout matter, as does and easy care yard.

In the end finally selecting one home over all the others will come down to more than just dollar and cents, it will come down to having the answers to all the questions that were important to your search for the ideal home and while no two buyers will always have the same set of criteria when it comes to selecting a home it would seem that lifestyle has in many cases moved to the top of the list. one

So call a Realtor, keep an open mind about your "must have list" and be prepared to make some compromises when it comes to making an offer on the home that both emotion and logic tells you should buy.
